Because they worked along the Mersey River for the large industrial town of Warrington - which had similarities to Lismore - I'm suggesting steel pilings be investigated for the prevention of flooding. What's more, they're available here in Australia.

The similarities are that the River Mersey goes through the town and flooded. Same as Lismore.

The other suggestion which may be considered is flood proof doors. Again, these work in the UK, so why not here. And again, they're available in Australia. This may help the multitude of businesses keep the water at bay.

Surely, on every aspect, prevention is far better than the cure.

We here in our town of Casino have been affected by the devastating loss of businesses in Lismore, hence we're victims too.
